This is the second in a series of capsule histories of coast artillery regiments. The concluding article will cover the National Guard regiments. This article deals with regiments in the Organized Reserve and those regiments created beginning in February 1942. The history of these units is particularly difficult, since few records were maintained for OR regiments, and many were redesignated with new regimental numbers, sometimes more than once. To compound the confusion, the army assigned the same number to more than one coast artillery regiment; for instance to separate harbor defense and antiaircraft regiments. This was based on the nature of the Organized Reserve, where many regiments, when organized, had only a handful of members actually assigned. However, before the AA regiments were actually organized they were renumbered, thus avoiding having coast artillery regiments organized with the same numbers. All the regiments created in the AUS during World War II were AA, and virtually all these were split into separate AA battalions in 1943.

Organized Reserve units were usually classified as harbor defense (HD), Railway (Ry), or Antiaircraft (AA), but in a few instances the records indicate units as "fixed defenses," or "heavy mobile artillery," and in one instance, a regiment was listed as both railway and harbor defense. The histories here have followed the designation as listed in the records of the Center of Military History.

Due to the scarcity of records, and the contradictory nature of some of the documents, it is too much to hope that these accounts are completely accurate. The decision was made to publish the best information that could be found, rather than waiting indefinitely for further information that might never be forthcoming. It is hoped that this will be helpful to the reader and will be accepted in this light. Additional information and corrections will be welcomed.

These histories for the most part concentrate on the organization and status of the regiments, without recounting the details of the wartime service of the regiments. Similarly, the accounts do not continue to the successor commands after the units no longer served as coast artillery. They are to a large extent based on the files of the Force Structure and Unit History Branch of the U.S. Army's Center of Military History, whose records, in turn, are a combination of records of official actions and unit history cards formerly maintained by the adjutant general.

While these records are generally reliable, they are generally more accurate and extensive after World War I than before, and more extensive for Regular Army and active rather than OR and inactive. Every effort, however, has been made to find and use the most reliable information. Particular appreciation is due to Joseph Frechette, of the Force Structure and Unit History Branch, whose assistance was as generous as it was essential.
